

Figure 11. Centralization coordinates form development. During the development of the form, as different micro-states develop at the same time in different locations, the need for coordination arises so the organism can perform vital functions. Different color circles illustrate different micro-states developing independently until a micro-state assumes the role of organizing center, playing an important role in the evolution of form by keeping the coordination between different parts of the form.