

Figure 8. Emergence and predictability of complex forms. If we add soap to water, the interaction between the hydrophilic head and the hydrophobic tail of the soap spontaneously creates a complex micelle form that can be explained by the physical and chemical properties of both soap and water molecules. This process is an example of a predictable complex form created by emergence.