

Figure 10: Sequential creation of a dynamic form. The first stage of shape formation is patterning and morphogenesis. In this stage, the general form of the body is defined in the protected environment of the womb. The second stage is a coordinated increase in the size of the form after birth, also considered growth and development. The third stage that continues throughout the life of the organism is the maturation of form.